

③ CAROL - SCRIPT

So, continuing from what my teammate just said about surviving university... I'd like to share two of my own struggles that really shaped my "survival skills" here.

First, let's talk about the most stressful event in every semester: Course Registration.

Every time the registration period starts, I suddenly stop being a normal human being. My heart rate goes up, my hands start shaking, and I stare at my laptop like I'm defusing a bomb. And the funniest part is — I pay a lot of tuition, but somehow I still have to fight for classes like I'm trying to buy concert tickets. Why am I begging to take the classes I already paid for?

And if it's a required course? That's not registration anymore — that's a Hunger Games audition. If you don't get it, you wait until next semester. No choice. So after many failures, I learned some "professional" strategies.

For example, go to a PC bang. The internet speed there makes you feel like you're hacking into a government system. And the most important rule: five minutes before registration — DO. NOT. REFRESH. If you refresh, everything is over. Just sit there, pray to the Wi-Fi gods, and accept your fate.

And if I still fail? Well... my final strategy is simple: beg the professor. Politely, of course. Sometimes they are kind and let me in. Sometimes they say no... and that's the moment I start questioning all of my life choices.

My second struggle is something I call the "difficulty jump." In freshman year, the classes are so easy that I felt like a genius. I thought, "Wow, maybe I'm actually smart."

But then in the next semester, everything suddenly becomes 10 times harder. It's like I learned $1+1=2$, and the next day the professor says, "Okay everyone, let's solve a calculus problem." I just sit there wondering when exactly I missed the transition.

At that point, the only strategy is pretending to understand everything during class, and then going home to let YouTube and ChatGPT rebuild my entire knowledge system. Honestly, they are my best friends now. They never judge me. They just help me survive.

Since I'm doing the ending for our group today, I just want to say: University is basically a long series of confusing situations that we slowly learn to deal with. Everyone struggles, even if they pretend they don't. But as long as we find our own way to survive — whether it's fast internet, caffeine, crying, or ChatGPT — we'll be fine.

So good luck to all of us... and remember: if you're confused, you're probably doing university correctly.
