I'd like to share two of the most painful struggles I've experienced at university, and how I survived them—well, barely survived them.

1. When Your File Disappears Into the Void

So, the programs I use for my assignments are very heavy. The file sizes are huge, and the work usually takes several hours—putting enormous pressure not only on me, but also on my extremely sensitive, temperamental laptop. This laptop—who has absolutely no manners—waits for the perfect moment when I let my guard down... and then suddenly freezes. It doesn't even give me half a second to press Ctrl + S. If I had managed to save it, trust me, I would not be talking about this trauma right now.

I'm sure many of you have experienced different forms of this digital heartbreak. In my case, the cursor stops moving, the screen slowly fades to white, and eventually, all that remains is the terrifying phrase: "Not Responding."

At that moment, my brain freezes too. My vision literally turns white. It's a full mental shutdown.

Now, here's the survival tip for this situation:

Honestly... there is none. Lag attacks like an assassin, targeting the exact second you didn't save.

The only thing you can do is this: When your friend screams because their computer froze, don't comfort them first. Instead, slam Ctrl + S on your own laptop and save your work. Trust me—this is an act of self-defense.

2. All-Nighters During Exam Week or Deadlines

Sleep is supposed to be an essential part of human survival.

However, students often have to sacrifice this essential element of life.

Just a few days ago, I pulled a series of all-nighters for a competition deadline and got almost no proper sleep.

To describe it visually: I entered Kanna, a 24-hour café, as Order No. 3, and I left when they were calling Order No. 280.

For about two weeks, I survived on an average of 10 hours of work a day, and 4 hours of sleep. When you reach that level of exhaustion, you no longer feel tired. You no longer even feel sleepy. You just... exist.

During these nights, the most common phrase we say to each other is: "I just want to sleep while it's still dark outside..." But by the time we finish our work, the sun is already rising.

Here's my survival tip:

People always say, "Make a schedule, don't procrastinate."

But let's be real—that advice is completely useless.

Instead, here's the real tip:

Work with friends.

When you're together, there are always random moments that make everyone laugh—and that tiny bit of joy keeps you alive. You can share the pain, stay awake longer, focus better, and actually work faster and more efficiently.

So if your assignments start piling up?

Find a friend, and procrastinate together.

It's teamwork!
